The most deciduous forests in the Bago Mountains of Myanmar have the best growth rates and highest stockings of teak (Tectona grandis) of any forest in the country (Kermode 1964). The Bago Mountain forests, including the Kabaung Reserved Forest, comprise 13.9% of the country's total teak-bearing forests (Aung Thant Zin 2000). Natural teak-bearing forests are

Under the MSS, the felling cycle is 30 years, and the minimum exploitable diameters at breast height (dbh) are 73 cm in moist forests and 63 cm in dry forests. Various tending operations are carried out to help restore the forests prior to the start of the next harvest cycle. The goal of this system is to sustainably harvest teak-bearing forests every
